To the Members of the Class of 1914:

This, our first class report, traces as carefully and as accurately as possible the various movements of our class,—athletic, social, and academic,—during its four years at Cambridge. Its purpose is to help keep before us, alongside of the class album, the memory of those four wonderful years, and in this I hope it will serve its purpose.

In it you will find the various criticisms of life at Cambridge, as brought out by many members in the space provided for the purpose in the Class Life blank that each one of you filled out. I have given more room to these “remarks” than is usual in the First Report as all the suggestions seemed so much to the point. I am only sorry that every line of every criticism could not be printed. An attempt has been made to classify these paragraphs into groups, so that the general idea of our class on each subject can be obtained. There are also many individual ideas placed at the end of the section.

A great deal of credit is due to Adolphus Terry for his careful and painstaking work in the preparation of this report, and for his persistent and tireless efforts in collecting data. The Class also owes thanks to the College Office for kindness in giving information, to the Crimson for use of its files, and to Messrs. McCarter and Kneeland for their work in printing the manuscripts.

In closing I wish to report what you have so often heard before, but on which too much stress cannot be laid, namely: in order that our class may continue, through our years of graduation, to maintain that spirit of unity, by which it has always been characterized during our undergraduate life, it is absolutely necessary that every man send me, at the earliest possible moment, any change in his address or occupation, as well as news of marriages or births, whenever these occur. It is also most important to fill out any information blanks quickly and thoroughly. In this way and in this way only, can we all keep in touch with each other through the future years.

TREASURER'S REPORT

To the Members of the Class of 1914:

Your Treasurer begs to submit the following report of all the receipts and expenditures of the Class Treasury from January 1st, 1914, to January 1st, 1915.

The bank balance on January 1st, 1914, $62.23 has been materially increased by the pledges of members, although it is surprising what a small percentage of the class, only 65 per cent., have contributed.

Another effort will be made very soon to persuade the other 35 per cent. to join in the fund and it is hoped they will coöperate quickly and generously. The amount of money pledged for this year, still unpaid, is comparatively small, but its prompt payment would be of great assistance to the class.

The expenditures of the class for the past year were rather heavy, due to the fact that the entertainments which were given during last spring were expensive and, in no case except the picnic, did they pay for themselves.

The Class Day Committee was particularly successful in the management of the festivities last June, and has already paid $1,000.00 to the treasury, with the promise of another substantial sum in the near future.

The Photograph Committee, which did so well with the Class Album, has repaid a good proportion of the sum lent them by the class, but their debt can be still further reduced if those who have not bought albums, would secure them from Richard D. Walker, Alpine Street, Malden, Mass., by sending him a cheque for $5.85 plus the cost of mailing. Weight of album is five pounds.

Upon the advice of a number of graduates who are closely in touch with the financial situation this year, your treasurer has deposited what money was available for investment in the Massachusetts Trust Company for the present, rather than follow the precedent of many previous classes who have purchased bonds and other securities.

In closing this report I wish to offer my personal thanks:

TREASURER'S REPORT

to the men who have aided me in many ways and to the class for its coöperation in response to my appeals.

Respectfully submitted,

ROBERT ST.B. BOYD,

Treasurer.

COMMENTS FROM THE CLASS

"The matter of democracy really needs no mention, and yet I wish to say that I have never met a man who had been in Harvard, either in the undergraduate, graduate, or law department, who thought that Harvard was not democratic. The tone is a little different, perhaps, than it is in some colleges, but it does not seem to me to be undemocratic. There are snobs here, no doubt, just as there are snobs in every college and every other organization under the sun. No one but malicious or uninformed outsiders would ever make the assertion that they form the chief portion of the student body. When Harvard comes to be judged by the men who know it, perhaps we shall finally have a reputation that is as it should be. I know one man in the Graduate School who said he was ashamed to tell his friends that he was coming to Harvard to take a post-graduate course, simply because it was said to be such a snobbish place. He was very much surprised to find it far otherwise. But enough; every Harvard man is a witness against such false statements."

"The progressivism and democracy is shown in scholastics and athletics, and it is for this reason that Harvard stands among the foremost of universities in these two all-important activities. Those alleging that Harvard lacks in democracy have a very superficial knowledge of the University. Ability and talent are soon recognized and snobbery is frowned upon. Many prejudices and erroneous views which I entertained upon entering Harvard, I have long since discarded, owing to the fair, candid, and thorough study which is given to all problems of life here."

"I believe the section work system a great detriment to a large college, yet I do not see how it can be altered. The student comes too little in contact with the head of a popular course. He really does not know the professor, he knows only the section head. If the professor could come in contact with the student more, it would inspire more confidence and interest in those courses. This could be done, possibly, by the professor conducting each section occasionally, or being present at the sections occasionally."

"First, I should like to see a new system of selecting assistants in courses. The present practice is abominable; mere boys, half-baked at that, are put in charge of sections, etc., whose members (freshmen) need the very best of teachers. As long as the college continues to give $500 or $600 for these positions the large courses will be burdened with untutored, boyish instructors."

"Paternalism should be encouraged instead of the reverse, as it is the paternalistic attitude on the part of the university which is likely to bring the students closer together. The establishment of a more healthy tradition in regard to work and a fairer and more sympathetic attitude toward the instructor. The lack of this is partly due, in my opinion, to the lack of uniformity among instructors and professors, in grading, leading the student to the conclusion that the whole thing is haphazard and frequently unfair. There is more or less of a tendency for instructors to be more book worms than good teachers. A man knowing rather less of a subject but with more aptitude for teaching it, is certainly more valuable than he of whom the reverse is true. At any rate, the general opinion around college seems to be that it is only too frequently fellows who do the least work who get the best marks."

"Those handicapped by deafness should be excused from attending lectures. The time otherwise spent in lectures could be made up under tutors recommended by the college. This would save an immense amount of time, wasted energy and nervous strain."

"In my opinion that which needs changing most at Harvard, is its system of instructors or the choice of them. If the minor instructor is a necessary evil, would that we might devise a scheme by which he might be selected because of his ability to judge as well as for his knowledge of the subject."

"Why should Harvard feel the pinch of poverty? Why should it be forced to employ underpaid and hence inferior assistants? Can there not be some method whereby the flood of magnificent buildings, bequests and prizes for composition in Aztec, may be turned to more immediate and pressing needs?"

"Mediocre assistants. In two courses particularly the section meetings were absolutely uninspired and dead. Concentrate more talent at the instruction end even at the possible disadvantage of larger section meetings."

"I think the first two years we should have academic work; the last two should be more like those of the Business School or Law School. Some Harvard men start working too late and the efficiency of our graduates is not noticed until they are twenty-six or thirty. Technology would grind them to work, why cannot Harvard give social as well as the useful training?"

"College should raise the cause of real literary interest among the preparatory school and hence in themselves."

"I think the tendency of the classes to concentrate their honors and demands upon too few persons is a mistake. We tend to require too much time from a rather small body of men. This is natural with the elective system, which is of course, the only one for important offices. I should like more use made of the appointive system for minor offices, which would give more non-prominent men an opportunity for service than they now have. In other words, I should like to see more men doing the class work."

HARVARD, 1914 — CLASS REPORT

"I think that the first two years of my college career were wasted, because I was not entirely settled. A similar case could be avoided by a simple change in the prescribed work. I believe that all freshmen should be compelled; unless they have anticipated certain courses, to take an elementary course in each one of the four groups in order that they may get an idea of what each field stands for. In this way, they will be enabled to ascertain just what they are interested in enough to make a thorough study of that field."

"As I have mentioned that the concentration system being more lenient toward history, government, and economics, than toward English science, etc., I also think that from what little I have seen that the chemistry department have as good equipment as the other departments which have laboratory. Chemistry A which is a large popular course has a very poor laboratory compared with zoology, botany and physics elementary courses. It is such a large course that it should be favored by light and air in the laboratory more than some of the higher and smaller courses if possible."

"There are a lot of theoretical details which a college man has to absorb and this does not add much interest to his work. A practical course which is rather rare, is earnestly sought for; if anyone is lucky to find one, it will seem to him that he has obtained from his college a valuable piece of information. This can be only applied to an undergraduate life. A graduate can get all the practical courses he desires; but it seems to me a misfortune to wait and to work so long before reaching a practical line of study. A majority of fellows get tired of four years of college, and they hate to think of going through three more years of graduate life."

"It seems to me that the strict rigidity of the concentration and distribution system of choosing courses should be somewhat relaxed. The three courses which I have put down as courses which I regret having taken were placed in that category, not because of any inherent defect in the subject matter or method of instruction, but because I did not need them nor want them, nor was interested in what they taught. I had to take them to conform to the distribution rules. If the college thinks it necessary that a man should take at least one science, especially in the case of a man who has had little or none before entering the university, I think it would be a wise plan to prescribe some general course in that department, rather than allow a student to try to evade the strict application of the rule by hunting for an easy course in that department. The tendency, moreover, on the part of the authorities is to make the student choose his field and courses too early, and he is likely to choose by names that slip enphionously from the mouth—such as Economics or Political Science. Of course forethought is desirable in choosing a course, but it should be very easy to change the curriculum one has made out for himself. A too strict application of these rules has the further defect that it restricts the earnest student and does no good to the careless one. The earnest student is probably not content to get merely a cursury knowledge of every subject and would probably get interested in one phase of his work to look more deeply into it. Restrictions for him merely hamper and impede; four courses in economics might be too much for him; he might prefer an extra course in history or government. Therefore, although I think a student should be compelled to take six or seven courses in a department, he should be allowed to distribute them in that department as he wishes. As for the careless student, his sole anxiety in regard to courses becomes merely the meeting of rules.”

“As things go now the student lets his work drag along until the finals and then for a day or two crams a lot of facts in his head and delivers them at the examinations and then in nine cases out of ten forgets almost everything he studied about it. It is just like an express wagon which loads up in the morning and during the day gradually unloads all its parcels at various houses. The student loads up with a lot of facts, distributes them on a lot of blue books and goes home and in too many cases away from college empty! Under such a system as I tried to suggest the review each month would so familiarize a man with work that by the finals it would be so much a part of him it would require but little extra work and he would have his knowledge there to stay. The most demoralizing times of undergraduate life at present are the mid-year and final periods."

"I think professional tutoring is very demoralizing. It never advances true education and men that get through college by resorting to tutors at examination time are usually not worthy of their degrees, which after all, are supposed to be given as testimonials of knowledge acquired, not hired over examination time."

"Like all academic courses, college fails to fit one for any definite occupation. After three or four years preparation one ought to be able to command some job, yet a college course seems to fail in that way. The inherent feeling of being better able to cope with problems does not impress the employer who is asked for an opening. Of course, teaching is the one exception."

"After all a man's college career, is the happiest time of his life, and he shouldn't spend it in worthless frittering away his time. He should at least try to get the most out of it."

"It seems to me that there is lacking a sense of responsibility among first and second year men in college; a sort of feeling that fun can be had indiscriminately up to about six months before graduation, and that a reversal of form then will lead to a perfectly sedate after life, commanding respect of everyone."

"The sooner we learn definitely to set up our own individual standards and discard those of the group, the better we shall prosper."

COMMENTS FROM THE CLASS

"I have found that many of those who enter college neglect to take up some form of activity outside of their regular college work. One does not realize the value of such lost opportunities until one is about to graduate, and then the realization causes bitter regret."

"Students should not be required to decide in which department they shall specialize or concentrate until the end of the sophomore year. I know of quite a few seniors who now regret their choice. The same reasons can be given in support of this as are given to prevent freshmen from taking Economics A."

"More latitude in arrangement of courses for distribution. I have been sadly handicapped in having to forego courses I wanted, through being obliged to take others to complete my scheme for distribution; present rules are good, but exceptions should be made."

"In my opinion the college has too few practical courses. The authorities admit that they do not attempt or wish to give practical courses but merely to train the mind. They expect a man to spend additional years if he wishes to grasp special or concrete ideas. There are exceptions—as Economics 9. Under the present rules for concentration and distribution a man cannot confine his work so closely to one subject as to make him narrow. Since this objection is removed, why would not a man get as much out of useful courses as out of the abstract?"

"The oral examination in French and German should be removed. The rules for concentration and distribution should be more liberal. A faculty adviser should be in that department in which the advisee is most interested, and therefore should not be chosen until after freshman year."

"A happy medium between probation at beginning of junior year and no probation at all for failure to pass the Oral examinations, is to require a more advanced half course additional in German or French which must be passed in junior year, but will not count for the degree, and finally at the beginning of senior year for failure to pass the Oral examination. This seems a more logical penalty for failure in an oral language."

HARVARD, 1914 — CLASS REPORT

"Place oral examination on a more equal basis for all."

"Oral examination in French or German does not fulfill its purpose. Many men who are proficient in one language fail repeatedly, while others who know little are passed at the first trial. If a portion of French A or German A were devoted to the sight translation, of unfamiliar text and a separate mark given at finals, for such work this mark might be used in place of the present oral examination. The present system seems to me more than useless since some men are unjustly held back in their work by failure to pass the examination."

"The oral examination should not be made so stiff, or so disastrous to those who fail to pass it, until it has become a well-established college regulation which is thoroughly understood by sub-freshmen as well as undergraduates."

"The work of Phillips Brooks House should increase from year to year and will grow more influential as the college comes to realize the sanity, the earnestness and the truth it represents. Harvard will probably never be like Yale religiously, but I hope the time will come when to be interested in Brooks House will be the thing for a large percentage of the undergraduates."

"With what little social life I have had, with what little athletic development I have experienced, and the rush with which I did my work in three years, I feel I have gotten a lot out of college. When I think of men who are able to take their full share of college life, I can only say what a wonderful opportunity they have. My three years in college have made me a bigger, better, and broader man. It has made me understand things that one who has no opportunity to associate with men from all over the world can never understand. The opportunity to study all kinds of men is alone enough to make college worth while. In looking back over my college career, I regret nothing that I have done, I only feel that I did not have opportunity to do more."

"Harvard has changed my entire life. It has imbued me with ideals of service. I do not hesitate to say that I shall lead a much better life than I would have led had I not come to Cambridge. In the land where I was born people of my race are persecuted. They are deprived of means of livelihood, of property, of life itself, without due process of law. Though called upon to pay all the customary taxes, and to serve in the army, they are not entitled to the rights of citizenship, or to police protection. Any hoodlum has a right to molest Jews; and to make matters worse, Jewish children are excluded from the public schools. For this reason, chiefly, my parents came to the United States. They desired to educate their children. Having spent the first eight years of my life in a very backward community, coming to New York was in itself a revelation. After that we first began to live. None of us could speak English, we were poor—more than once we lived on one meal a day—but liberty, American ideals and freedom from persecution, meant so much to us that hunger didn't matter. Ten years later I came to Harvard, a pioneer I trust. It is not necessary to state what a hard time I had getting here, or how rough the sailing was at times; suffice it to say I came here, and managed to get an excellent training, one which has added meaning to my life. Harvard as an institution has its faults. In the main, however, it is wisely and beneficently run. Not a few of the students come from the wealthy families which correspond to the nobility of Europe. On the other hand men, like myself, from obscure origin, represent the poorer classes. Yet here both receive the same training. In one respect at least we start out in life on a par. Harvard brings such a state about. Nowhere but in this glorious country is such a thing possible. There are some things in existence of which we need to feel ashamed, but of what has been called the "social ladder" we may well be proud. It has been my privilege to come in contact with professors—masters—who also set a splendid example of manhood. The mere coming in contact with them is an inspiration. Wise, kind, and always ready to lend a hand. Many a time, when things looked black, when it seemed that I was making no progress, but groping around in the dark, at least one of the professors to whom I have referred came to the rescue. I can never repay them directly, I can never repay the University directly, but follow their example by helping others. They have imparted to me not only much valuable knowledge, but a religion of service—one so admirably expressed in a motto inscribed on one of the gates. 'Depart to serve better thy country and thy kind.' "

"I think the estimate of knowledge of self—this lifting of the curtain exposing and revealing the consequences of immorality and debauchery—and showing the effect on man and his race of wrong living, will serve to impress on every freshman the advantages of clean living and the terrible effects of wrong living and so arm him with an armor that should render him practically immune from the temptors in a big city that too often wreck a promising career."

"In general, I think I have derived from my life at Harvard a greater and deeper knowledge of men; a few habits of thought and ways of looking at things which I hope will be valuable assets in the future; and a great deal of inspiration from the more gifted men of learning, whose instruction it was a pleasure and a privilege to have experienced."

"Perhaps, if my senior adviser had been a little more active, and told me in my freshman year the importance of doing something, I might have gotten more satisfaction out of my college course; as it was, I didn't even know him by name."

"Make the faculty adviser more than a mere signer of study cards. Let him be a friend."

"I want to go on record as advocating a wider effort to assist the unknown freshman on the part of the senior adviser. I refer particularly to the man who comes from a high school and who is unacquainted with the ways of college. The preparatory school man, in most cases, comes here knowing friends ahead of him and with him, and knowing general features of college life. With the high school man the case is different. He has lived at home and has, as a rule, seen only men of his own town and of his own general type. There are often no athletics or other activities well enough organized to bring him into serious competition with his equals or betters. Perhaps, if his station in life was above that of his school-mates his position in the school may have been thrust upon him. Therefore when he comes to college his lot is often a hard one. He is often completely at sea with regard to the organization of college life and frequently most diffident to enter when he knows it. This diffidence often arises from his inability to perceive that other men will be as glad to know him as he to know them. Now all this can be materially remedied by giving to the freshman more personal influence in the main by the senior adviser. I believe that the new Freshman Dormitories will do much in this direction, but there still remains work for the adviser, with this type of man. He needs to take a personal and not merely passive interest in his advisee. He should go to the freshman rather than wait for the freshman to come to him. He should urge upon him the need of making something of himself and show him how to go about it. He should exert every effort to have his advisee bring out whatever talents or abilities he may have. In this way the adviser will render a colossal service to the inexperienced freshman, and in giving his college its biggest asset—real men."

HARVARD, 1914 — CLASS REPORT

"I find first of all a growing tendency towards paternalism in the relations of the faculty to the students. College is only for those who know how to profit by it. The university should get rid of the rest instead of trying to force them up to a lowered college standard by a paternalistic elective system. Faculty advisers, etc., 'treat a man like a man and he will be a man' is my maxim and I consider the elective system a distinct impediment if not an insult to the sort of man who is fitted for college life. I disapprove also of all babyish, horseplay, prep. school, small college, undignified society initiations quite unnecessary to the accomplishment of this purpose."

"The existence of so much 'red tape' chiefly under the guise of the petition system, should be abolished, and some method substituted whereby the student could come into closer personal contact with the 'powers that be,' when not on official business of the college."

"I think it is rather a pity that more fellows do not get to know more of the instructors and professors, for it would certainly enrich a good course if you knew the instructor—and also—it might prevent your taking some of the uninteresting ones. The faculty adviser is supposed to be a guide and helping hand, but in too many cases men see their faculty advisers once or twice a year to talk over courses and coaxe their signature and beyond that their acquaintance does not go. Very fortunately I had an extremely interesting young man who was not so old that he could not see a student's point of view."

"Military instruction should be required in order to make a man more prepared to serve his country in case of emergency in later years."

"There is too much attention paid to athletics with the mere aim of winning and for the excitement. The true purposes and benefits of athletics are neglected by the student."

COMMENTS FROM THE CLASS

"Among the things that are at Harvard that I think should not be, are the athletic sports, such as football, especially intercollegiate games. It detracts from legitimate college interests, namely, the course of studies that the individual happens to take; accordingly I think that sports in connection with college should be abolished."

"I believe that compulsory athletics for freshmen should be established as soon as possible, and that military training should be offered as an alternative to at least a part of this compulsory athletics. Compulsory military training, however beneficial, might be too radical for Harvard."

"I would add, that there is altogether too much importance attached to men of notable athletic ability. It seems that the preference and consideration, and officers, clubs, and honors of all sorts open, and given to them, is out of all proportion and reason to what should be the case."

"Too great stress on the final exams, and the subsequent evil of cram knowledge. Your knowledge of a course may be nil two nights before the final and your grade for the work the years work (due to the final grade) may put you in good running for Phi Beta Kappa. A more equitable distribution of examinations (e.g. monthly finals) to create a better distribution of effect."

"I believe in more standardization in the marking system. Each part of a course (exam., thesis, section papers, etc.), should count a certain fixed percentage and the final grade should be the sum of these. In this way, a student in a course knows what his grades are all the time. The professor has too much lee-way now and the personal element is sometimes very strong. In most courses, a thesis doesn't count for you to any great degree, no matter how high the grade, but if the student gets a low mark it counts very much against him."

HARVARD, 1914 — CLASS REPORT

"I think the system of marking in Harvard College is in sore need of standardizing. No one can have failed to notice the difference in the grading in the various courses he has taken."

"It seems wholly impracticable here to have compulsory chapel attendance, as is done at other colleges, but I believe that it could be accomplished with a complete revision of the aims and character of the service as now presented. If it were made compulsory, a much larger chapel would at once become necessary and it would be a great advantage if its interior were not made so funeral and forbidding to the average undergraduate, who is not, typically, either pious or especially religious."

"The chapel seems to be misunderstood and underestimated by too large a number of the students. Whether fellows get an erroneous impression of devotional exercises before reaching Harvard, or whether they lack the sense of appreciation of theological expression, it is an unfortunate fact that chapel is not enjoyed by those who would be more generally benefitted by the noble thoughts there expressed."

"More college unity, such as would depend on the college's meeting as a whole at definite times (as in other colleges at chapel). Never have I been at a gathering when I knew the whole college was there, and when we could all be addressed as 'men of Harvard Today.' I missed this."

"There is a lack of correlation of interests. A new elective representative basis for the Student Council and the taking over by it of the Forum."

"Lack of avenues for expression of obscure interests could be remedied by the Forum and by less rigid standards in regard to communications in the Crimson."

"Stimulating student body; instead of one which is proud of failure to study. This is not entirely true, however."

COMMENTS FROM THE CLASS

"We are all too suspicious. The man from one part looks on the man from another part with suspicion which is returned with interest."

"My course at Harvard has been more profitable than I expected, for which I am grateful and which I hope to repay in some measure, at some future time."

"In general Harvard embodies all that conducts toward the development of manly character, brilliant individuality, and inherent genius."

"Before long a serious fire will make the college authorities wake up to the fact that the fire-escape facilities on the college buildings are entirely inadequate. Why not remedy this now?"

"I regret to say that during the two years I lived in Cambridge, I went to all too few of the lectures which are given by persons of accomplishment and renown. I have, however, enjoyed very much, many of the opportunities to hear excellent music, given either independently or in connection with the Music Department.

"The grading of students by A, B, etc., leaves too much power in the instructor's hands in the selection of a B+ or an A—. This is only 1-4 of one gradue but it very often means the difference between a group and nothing, a scholarship and nothing. I believe that number marking is better."

"What Harvard needs most at this time is a sane, healthy and vigorous dillittantism! I consider it a woeful condition that in three and one half years of college I have not met men to whom the name of dillittante could applied with any propriety. The fact that dillittantism is looked upon with suspicion at Harvard would seem to indicate that Harvard is doing nothing to counteract one weak and vicious specialization of interests. I mean that absurd commercial concentration which characterizes American life. If the thousands who leave Harvard each year, not to speak of the graduates of other colleges were to be true dilettantes, we should at least have a tradition of culture in America instead of a spacious tradition of commercial art."

"With all seriousness I suggest that the thing most urgently demanding removal in my four years of experience, is the dormitory of the College House type. Without heat, devoid of flooring (splinters, with dust as a filler, are used for this purpose), innocent of sunlight or cleanliness, and abounding in a multitude of 'pneumonical' drafts,—everyone knows what they are. An up-to-date college might at least put in steam heat or electric lights—or even shaving mirrors in the bath rooms."

"I have failed to find any place to exercise on Sunday. Why not open the gymnasium or some tennis courts for an hour or two on that day?"

"A tendency which has not yet grown objectionable, but which will if carried to its logical conclusion is the concentration of classes. Seniors now room together and so will freshmen, and probably tremendously good results. But if this tendency should result in restriction of friendships to the confines of one's class, the result would be deplorable. Some of my closest friendships, from which I have gained not merely comradeship, but advice, inspiration, and what is more testing as distinguished from "social" friendships have been of classes above me or in the graduate schools. I do not underestimate the value of class friendships, but I think the thing may eventually be overdone. But in general for college, faculty and classmates, I have nothing but praise."

"I think the Group System, or rather the specialization system, is so difficult for the average freshman to understand that its thorough exploration should constitute a college course, say English A, subsequently tested by an examination, I feel that it is hard for a sophomore to know just what he wants to specialize in, and I think that the laws governing specialization should be made more lenient. I know now that I should never have specialized in science, but at the time neither I nor the advisory system were sufficiently posted to prevent my doing so. Too many students say: 'He don't.' This might be cured in an English course."

"The absurd system of determining whether a student is to be given a degree of A.B. or S.B. that now prevails, viz., A.B. if Latin is prescribed for admission and S.B. if Latin is not prescribed seems to me to be an heirloom well worthy of being discarded to the scrap heap. It is so ridiculous on the face of it that the burden of proof is a phase that will not urge its abolition."

"Although I have attended lectures, recitations, and football games, I have never really 'gone to college,' on account of my living at home."

"I object to the Freshman Dormitories in principle, and doubt whether they will work out satisfactorily in practice."

BACCALAUREATE SERMON

To the Class of 1914

BACCALAUREATE SERMON

PRESIDENT ABBOTT LAWRENCE LOWELL.

“The text is from II Kings XIII, 14-19.”

“14. Now Elisha was fallen sick of his sickness whereof he died. And Joash, the King of Israel, came down unto him and wept over his face, and said O my father, my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!

“15. And Elisha said unto him, Take thy bow and arrows. And he took unto him bow and arrows.

“16. And he said to the King of Israel, Put thine hand upon the bow. And he put his hand upon it: and Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands.

“17. And he said, Open the window eastward. And he opened it. Then Elisha said, Shoot. And he shot. And he said, The arrow of the Lord's deliverance, and the arrow of deliverance from Syria: for thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek, till thou have consumed them.

“18. And he said, Take the arrows. And he took them. And he said unto the King of Israel, Smite upon the ground. And he smote thrice, and stayed.

“19. And the man of God was wroth with him, and said, Thou shouldest have smitten five or six times: then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it: whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice.”

“This is the story of the visit of the young king to the dying prophet, to seek his advice, or merely to pay his tribute of respect. No doubt Joash was well intentioned or he would not have come, but we may suppose that the prophet thought he perceived a weakness in his character, or in the the working of the spirit of God through him, which to Elisha were probably much the same thing. In the striking of the ground thrice only, he seemed to detect a lack of the persistence sorely needed by the ruler of the kingdom in those troubled times, and therefore he was wroth.

HARVARD, 1914 — CLASS REPORT

But whatever it was that moved Elisha so strongly, this story like many of those in the Old Testament, is built on simple human qualities, and hence contains a truth of wider application.

“The men who make a rapid success in their first venture in life are not numerous, and some of them are actually injured by it. A young man must perforce choose his career before he has tried it. He must estimate his own qualities, with which he is still only partly familiar; and he must guess how well they fit him for an occupation of which he has no personal experience. He judges of a profession for example, by its intellectual side. His turn of mind is so analytical and logical that he feels rightly a fitness for the study of law; or he has a taste for the biological sciences which attracts him to medicine; but he may or may not lack the enterprise, tact, and skill that bring clients and patients. It is no wonder then that he sometimes makes a mistake, or finds the road harder and longer than he expected. Among the men I happen to have known, few have made a quick success,—and their marked success—in the thing they first undertook. Some have become disheartened and given up the fight. Almost all have gone through periods of discouragement, some to win a victory in the career first chosen, others to win it in quite a different one. The successful men have smitten, not once, or thrice, but until success came, and then have kept on smiting.

“Success is, no doubt, an illusive thing, very hard to measure, and it is still more difficult to mark the steps on the way thereto. Let no man, therefore, be discouraged by failure to achieve an early success in the eyes of men. There is a middle course of good sense between those who have failed because they do not win speedy recognition, and those who feel that the world does not appreciate their talents. The world usually,—not invariably,—but usually, judges a man’s product justly enough; but much time often passes before the world has a chance to judge it, and until that time comes a man must measure himself, not by what the world thinks he could do, but by the progress of his own command of the tools of his trade. Success in the long run is founded mainly on the mastery of a subject, on comprehensiveness and accuracy in dealing with its problems; and in most pursuits that require long years, sometimes the better part of a lifetime. This does not mean that there is any time to spare; that there is no need of hastening along the road. A working life is short enough at the best, a span in which each year is the father of the next and determines the heritage of all that follow. But it is a reason for not being discouraged by lack of early recognition. If a man has an unusual mastery of any subject, if he can do something better than others can do it, the chances are that in time he will have a good market for his wares.

“As one travels along the road of life, the perspective changes. Things that appeared high sink lower in the landscape, while other things bulk larger than they did at first. The towers in the town are less conspicuous, and the long low hill, that hardly seemed an eminence, stands well above them and covers the horizon. So as one reviews the careers of many men, one's estimate of the value of different qualities undergoes a change. One sees that comparatively small results are accomplished by ability and intellectual brilliancy alone, unconnected with the moral qualities of earnestness in purpose, of industry and of persistence. We call these qualities moral, not because they are by any means always directed to moral ends, but to distinguish them from pure intellectual capacity. They are moral in the sense that they are related to character, and determine the force and steadiness with which an object is pursued, be that object in itself good or bad. They are the qualities most important in the attainment of that object. At the bar, in medicine, in science, in politics, in business, in almost every career, men of moderate capacity without striking originality, but possessed of good sense and adequate equipment for their tasks, have achieved very much by hard work, long sustained; while many a man of high talent has accomplished little or nothing worth doing, from a lack of incentive or of perseverance. To reach the very highest results both qualities are essential.

HARVARD, 1914 — CLASS REPORT

Such a combination is, of course, rare; but the moral qualities are indispensable for any considerable achievement. Moreover, we must remember that natural gifts come to us mainly at birth from causes beyond our power, while the moral qualities, although in great part innate, can be cultivated to an almost indefinite extent, and are therefore subject to our own control.

“A very notable fact about these moral qualities is that they are wholly transferable from one career to another. A knowledge of law is of trifling importance in most other occupations, but earnestness, industry and perseverance, acquired in the study and practice of law, are of just as much value in any other field as if they had been acquired therein. They are the strong foundations on which all success is built; and to an extent sometimes unseen, and usually unforeseen, they determine what the structure shall be. Superstitious people in all ages have regarded destiny as a mysterious power independent of us, which controls our future, lies in wait for us when we least suspect it and dogs our steps. It does in fact, dog our steps, precedes or follows us, clings to us, may please or provoke us, sadden us, scare us or haunt us. We cannot shake it off nor flee away from it, any more than we can from our own shadow, but like our shadow, it is not independent of us. The shade you cast upon the ground as you walk is the shadow of your body, and the destiny that goes with you is the shadow of your mind and character. There are, of course, grave differences of opportunity among men, and they count for much. It would be absurd to pretend not to see them, or to make light of them. But it is also a mistake to throw upon them the blame for our own shortcomings. In this twentieth century America of ours the difference in men's success—not the difference in wealth but in the achievement of things that are really worth doing—that difference is due less to opportunities presented, than to taking full advantage of those that come.

“If success in life depends largely upon the moral qualities to which I have referred, and if those qualities are under our own control, it is obviously of vital importance to ask how they can be cultivated. The answer is so commonplace that it seems hardly worth making. Like all moral qualities, they are developed by use, and by use alone. The man who indulges himself will become self-indulgent. The man who schools himself to subordinate his immediate desires to a distant object will become earnest and persevering, and as a part thereof, if he works steadily and hard when he does not want to do so, he will become industrious. To some men this comes easier than to others, and the man with the least appetite for work has to work the hardest to form the habit of work. Unfortunately, this is true of many things in life. It is the penalty paid by the individual for the benefit to the whole from variety of temperament.

"I have said that success is an elusive thing, very hard to measure, and sometimes a man does not himself know whether he has made a success or not. One of the merchants in Boston, in the middle of the last century conceived the brilliant idea of sending ice to India. To keep it from melting in the long voyage of a sailing ship through tropical seas was no easy matter, and ship after ship came back with the tale that the ice was all gone when she reached Calcutta. One of the captains reported that the voyage had again been a failure, for when the hold was opened there was not a piece of ice in it bigger than a man's head. Mr. Tudor asked him whether there was really so large a piece of ice as that, and making sure of it, exclaimed that success was won, feeling confident that if the water in the hold had been kept nearly at the freezing point, a little more skill would save the bulk of the cargo; and so it proved. Some of the leaders in political reforms, in human thought, in religion, some of the world's greatest benefactors, have gone to their graves believing that they had made failures, when in fact they had planted the seed which no force could stop from bearing the fruit of its season. They had not the patience and faith of Kepler, who said of his book on astronomy, that it might well wait a hundred years for a reader, as God had waited thousands for an observer. Every martyr for any cause has been, although not in his own eyes, at least in those of the multitude, a failure.

“Success is certainly an elusive thing. Does it mean the mere satisfaction of desires or ambitions, whatever they may be? If a man’s desire is to gratify immediate cravings for pleasure with as little exertion as possible, and he does so, has he made a success of his life? Clearly not. The mere satisfaction of desire, then, is not success unless the object desired is worthy. Is a man successful if he attains a worthy object for which he set forth in early life, and unsuccessful if he fails to attain it, although he does accomplish something else which gratifies him far less, but is of more value to others?

“If success is to be measured by the attainment of the objects for which men set out on the ventures of life, then there are very few successes in the world; and those mostly of a rather poor quality. Unless a man has a peculiarly contented disposition, or ambitions not of an exalted kind, he is rarely satisfied with his achievements; and the higher his goal, the farther he will, no doubt, usually go, but the farther he will probably be from reaching it. True success does not depend upon achieving the objects a man has set before himself at the outset of his career, on the satisfaction of ambitions, or aims, or on being contented with what he has attained. Happiness and contentment depend upon the relation between desires, and the ability to satisfy them, or to think one has satisfied them. A clam is happy at high water, if it needs nothing but high water to make it happy; but a higher organism requires more, and commonly more than it gets. Discontent does not signify either moral excellence or defective character. It may go with either. Some of the Saints and heroes have been highly self-satisfied, and others have been deeply distressed by their own imperfections; some have gone through periods of both exaltation and depression.

“True success does not consist in doing what we set forth to do, what we had hoped to do; not even in doing what we have struggled to do; but in doing something that is worth doing. One of the Rabbinic “Sayings of the Fathers” declared "It is not thy duty to complete the work, but neither thou art free to desist from it." There are hosts of men who have never had the satisfaction of succeeding in what they have undertaken who have been to all appearances failures and to whom omniscience can say " Well done, good and faithful servants." The gratification even of the most laudable aims, ambitions, and desires is not the object of life. That object lies beyond our personal satisfaction, contentment or happiness; and it is the very fact that it does so, which makes the life of a man worth living. We may explain to ourselves this paradox in different ways, according to the nature of our philosophy; and some explanation of it lies at the root of all religion. The man who sees clearly how and why the object of his life lies outside of, and beyond himself, and to whom the solution of the problem has become a deep conviction in the innermost recesses of his soul, has the greatest sustaining power this world affords."

BACCALAUREATE HYMN

Tune, Alford. (Ten Thousand Times Ten Thousand.)

PHILIP WARREN THAYER.

The knell of parting fellowship
In every heart is tolled,
The fleeting happiness of youth
Is crumbling into mold;
But like a mantle from the past,
Illumined by Thy ray,
The splendid heritage of years
Descends on us this day.

Our Mother's blessing be our stay,
Whate'er may lie before,
And let us cherish her ideals
As men have done of yore;
So toiling ever earnestly,
With perfect trust in Thee,
Then may we reap as we have sown,
In fruits of charity.

The path of duty nobly drawn
Is stretched across the years,
Through blissful meadows of content,
Through darker lanes of tears;
Serenely conscious of Thy grace,
May we confirm Thy might,
To find at last a resting place
In everlasting light.

CLASS ORATION

(SUCCESS AS AN END IN LIFE)

ALEXANDER LOUIS JACKSON.

Friends of the Graduating Class! Members of the Class of 1914! At this very important juncture in our lives, at what for most of us is to be a very real parting of the ways, it may behoove us to pause just a moment that we may look back over the record of the past four years before going further along any one of the many forked roads just ahead.

We have traversed these four years together as a class, working and playing according as our fancies led or our interests bade us. Guided by the enthusiasm, the unflagging interest, and the astounding knowledge and sympathy of our Professors, we have pursued our studies in Literature, Science, Philosophy, and History, and passed examinations about most of them.

On the athletic field, we have worked, and struggled, and cheered for the successes which we have hoped would bring glory to Harvard and to our class.

In the midst of all these things, each one of us has carried hidden deep down in his heart that driving, gnawing hope, that vague, indefinable something which some men call "A Dream." Others call it "Purpose." But it is best known to most of us as an ideal.

Whatever you may wish to call it, it is there. A powerful, sometimes an uncontrollable, force which urges and drives us on. Yes, it demands success of us in some given direction.

Now as we look back over our course, as we examine once more the records of those men about whom we have studied, as we summarize the qualities of those classmates whom we have acknowledged as successful and worthy leaders, as we go over once more the fields of our own little triumphs and failures, how are we going to define success for our use and for our standard in these years to come? When the struggle may grow bitter, when we may be crowded and hard pressed with our backs to the wall, with the world hurling itself upon us, shrieking its battle-cry at us as the sole standard of success? What if that cry deny the truth or effectiveness of our own slogan or standard? But a denial will have been in vain if we shall have found a real, true, living standard of success and of light.

Perhaps the best way to get at a possible standard is to examine some interest which is typical of, and common to, most college men. Suppose we take football. Not because we all play football; but because to a great many people the name is synonymous with college life, and because it does absorb the interest and attention of the majority of us, and certainly touches the interests and lives of us all in some way.

In spite of its risks to its players we pronounce Football "good!" Why? Because success in the game for the individual player or for a team demands the same sort of qualities which we recognize as necessary for the carrying out of that ideal which some of us guard so jealously from prying eyes.

Now a successful football player must have strength and speed. He must be able to cover his territory with the maximum of effectiveness and a minimum of effort. He must have a thorough knowledge of the rules; of his duties; and of possible situations which may spell victory or defeat for his team.

Moreover, he must know the duties and responsibilities of the other players; always be ready and willing to assist the other fellow. That is Team Work! Last but not least, he must be able to stick: to play the game through, against odds, against all handicaps; and take a beating if need be while he still "plays the game."

Eleven men with these qualities—a thorough knowledge of the rules; speed and alertness in carrying out those rules; willingness and ability to play together, and the stamina to stick it through no matter what happens. Eleven such men playing against eleven other men with these same qualities transform us into a straining, yelling, delirious mob on some cold bracing November afternoons. And no wonder!

These men have, and are using to the utmost, the qualities which we want, and are striving to attain for use in a million other ways. Is it a wonder that this concrete evidence, this perfect demonstration of their powers should excite us just a bit?

It has been said that, "Nothing succeeds like success." If we use the word "success" as we shall define it, we should be able to demonstrate that this premise applies to the whole scheme of life.

In the illustration I have just used, we found ourselves recognizing and approving the demonstration of the possession, and the ability to use certain qualities which we feel make for success. I say we "feel" because we cannot quite put our hands on these qualities even though we know they are there. Our hearts leap into our throats at the sight of a loose ball which someone has fumbled. We push violently against our neighbor in our unconscious attempt to aid the fleet runner in his quick dash for the opponents' goal-line, and we sigh when he has crossed it safely, as we prepare to cheer, if he happens to have belonged to our side.

Heretofore we have been accustomed to seeing the evidence of success rather than feeling it. Nowadays, we have grown weary of mere external success. At least many of us are weary, and we refuse any longer to identify success with the mere amassing of great wealth. We may or may not believe that its possessor has the qualities of which we approve; that he might have thrilled us at one time with a demonstration of his ability to use those qualities. Anyway we refuse to accept wealth alone as evidence .

Of course, we understand and admit that "Every laborer is worthy of his hire."¹ But it is equally clear that an enterprise is neither more nor less successful simply because it brings money. We have certainly learned that only the deluded or the ignorant believe that money alone can purchase whatever life holds of value.

It must be quite plain to us that success is purchasable only in terms of wisdom, effort, conduct, and character. We know this because we have seen it proved time and time again on the football field, in the wise direction of a head coach, in the conduct and make-up of a good team. Moreover if proof still be lacking, have we not proved it for ourselves in success or failure in many an examination? These facts imply the conviction that life exists for a certain purpose; that there are laws which secure success even though external and financial conditions be adverse.

Now we are ready to define success as Horatio Dresser has defined it for us—"Success or the Efficient Life is the right use of the Will, with all that this power implies, as the activity which co-ordinates; which lifts desires; develops character; and ascends to the level of thought." In a word, Success is being true to our best selves while we train and mould what we feel to be unworthy of that best self until it conforms to and obeys the Will that directs the former.

We began life "equipped with a collection of instincts, feelings, and tendencies." We have been trying to analyze, to train, and to modify these instincts in ourselves, while we have studied similar characteristics and the processes of their development in others. It requires very little knowledge to show that we are aware of all sorts of strivings, dissatisfactions, and aspirations within ourselves, about which we have heard many theories. But when the best has been said in favor of all our theories and our creeds, the impressive fact remains that life is richer than theory, and teaches above all creeds.

For us then, it remains to guard carefully our feelings; to direct wisely our instincts, to mark always the rise of the tide of life, lest the flood breaks its bounds and carries us whirling and bumping, bereft of moorings and standards, amidst the rocks of the wrong shore.

Since conduct is said to be "three-fourths of character," the first essential is responsiveness to the impulses that send us forth to action; to the feelings that keep us alive, expressive, and free; and that make us open to the love of mankind.

CLASS ORATION

If we bear in mind what our life here has taught us:—that the other fellow has the same tendencies, the same feelings, and the same instincts; that we only have to meet him half-way to bring forth an expression of them. If we can only remember that as we smile or manifest a spirit of joy or of thanksgiving, so will the world smile with us day by day, we will always have an effective means at our command to lift us above material circumstances, above routine and above all littleness, even while we meet and conquer them.

I have been speaking of the life and the problems of the individual, although a little while back I mentioned teamwork.

However, the first problem is the attainment of the right adjustment between the various powers within ourselves, so that worthy incentives shall always inspire, while reason controls every activity according to its value. The second problem as has been aptly said, "is to adjust ourselves to our fellows so as to contribute our share of work and service to the world and yet attain self-realization." That is teamwork!

Now to work and play effectively, we must have faith in ourselves and in our fellow men. We must believe that every man and woman is capable of contributing his or her share toward the total sum of happiness. People tell us that we are living in an age such as the world has never known. An age whose slogan is "social efficiency and responsibility." Man's interests have gone out beyond the narrow limits of his own home. We no longer build walls and ramparts around our houses or bar our windows to protect our individual families. But we go out in the streets, and station officers to guard and regulate traffic for the safety of the families of others as well as our own. We have come to realize that the street, the community, and the state, must be as safe and as pleasant to live in as our own homes.

In order to make them so, we must cooperate with the other fellow; get ideas from him; see and understand his point of view; be willing to combine our ideas with his, and when necessary or advisable, give up our own plans and wishes if by so doing we can advance the interests of the whole.

Life has taught us that whether we like it or not we cannot escape from ourselves or our fellow-men, that the consequences of our actions concern our neighbors as well as ourselves. Therefore we are striving more earnestly to study the consequences of the actions of individuals upon the life of society as a whole, and to find ways of regulating and guiding those actions for the greatest good to the greatest number.

Upon us as a part of that society, a part which should be more cognizant of the consequences of acts because of the special opportunity we have had to study the results of the actions of others in the world's history—upon us falls a very large share of this responsibility for the advancement of the "social good."

To fulfill this responsibility, we must ever keep before us the ideal of team play, an ideal which will demand a ready sympathy, with an ability to understand, and a willingness to help solve the problems of the other fellow. The fellow who may be placed in different circumstances from our own and therefore be forced to see things differently, and perhaps more clearly than we do. The fellow who despite these differences is a part of the team. The team that is working for the amelioration of the sufferings and wrongs of mankind, for the increase of understanding, happiness, and good cheer in the world, and the real salvation of us all.

If this team is to win, it must have the most unselfish as well as wisest of leaders. It must have willing, well-trained followers, and the moral support of everyone of us whether we be captains or players.

Players who will play the game for the sheer joy of it and because they have faith in the invisible something that guides and directs their play. Men who will scorn to "play to the gallery" because they know that leads to carelessness, weakness, and defeat—dishonorable defeat. Men who will charge g-a-i-n as well as loss up to the team; upon whom we can depend to play the game to the finish because it is the c-a-u-s-e, the g-a-m-e itself, they love and not the applause and the glory.

May it be given to us then to face the world squarely, in the full realization of what it demands of us and what we owe it. May we ever be actuated by the desire to play the game according to the rules. Win or lose, let us look upon each contest as but a step toward the ultimate goal as we may have learned to see it. May we never falter in our determination to attain that goal, so that in the years to come, we may in truth throng back to the jubilees of "Fair Harvard"; unafraid and unashamed because we will have faithfully served her and the things for which she stands, and always will stand, as long as her sons go forth to the fray breathing prayerfully to their Maker:—

Not unto ourselves Oh Lord! be Thy blessing, for unto Thy work and unto Thy children do we consecrate ourselves and our lives.

CLASS POEM

CHARLES PELHAM CURTIS, JR.

Students standing face to face
With the World demand a place,
Ask an opportunity,
Eagerly and hopefully—
“World, we bring thee from our youth
All our visions of the truth,
Born from all the hopes and fears
Of the dreams of twenty years.
All that we have guessed or thought,
What unfinding we have sought,
These, O World, to thee we’ve brought.

Heretofore our eyes were cast
On the road by which we passed;
What we saw was close at hand,
Sight too near to understand.
But these last four years have raised
Eyes to where thy glory blazed.
Harvard led us to the door
Which we did not see before.
World, our dreams we offer thee;
Trust in such maternity Brings us to thee hopefully.”

Silence; then in discontent
Spoke the Old Man vehement—
“Here, young men, you understand,
Frills of speech are contraband.
Hopes and dreams and aspirations,
Are to me but suspirations,
Wind to belly flags, not sails,
Idle zephyrs, never gales.

CLASS POEM

Let me be your counsellor;
Learn with those who've gone before,
A knock will not unlock a door."

"Though we bring thee," they replied,
"Hearts too swollen with our pride,
We demand the right to try
To give our dreams reality.
Can a sod produce a flower?
Have we visions dreamed of power?
The flower has a right to grow;
Our visions have the right to show
Their truth to God, their use to thee.
Give us, World, a chance to be Doers of the things we see!"

Then the Great World's countenance
Blessed the young men's confidence—
"Children, so you come to me
With something more than vanity.
Your visions do not seek to shirk
The complement of visions, work.
You want a job—I offer you
More than all mankind can do.
Out of sight of dreamer's eyes
Stretch my possibilities,
The fairyland of true romance,
Beyond the hills of circumstance.
But your visions, yours and mine,
Hold them fast; they are the sign
Of the work I offer you.
Children, may your hopes come true;
Dreamers and doers, one in two!"

THE IVY ORATION

JAMES RIPLEY OSGOOD PERKINS.

Wives, Mothers and Sweethearts,—if any; Fathers, Brothers and Sisters, and all more or less distant relations—spread Omega Oil. Behold in my face the pallor, and on my hand the quiver of the confirmed gambler. I stand before you today the victim of an election bet. I bet a quarter that I shouldn't be elected, lost the quarter and, as a result, have to stand before you here doing my best in the allotted time to say—nothing. Hence, I lose all around, money, possibly my reputation, doubtless my self-respect. However, my campaign expenses in detail will appear for public perusal in tomorrow's Crimson.

There comes a time in all annual events when certain things happen; for instance, in the existence of every tube of tooth paste there comes a time when a roommate leaves the cover off; then the paste dries up. Just so in every class day, there comes a time when someone leaves the cover off and out oozes the Ivy oration; lies flat on the brush or falls flat on the audience and, in time, thank Heaven, dries up and blows away! This class day is no exception. The lid is off, the ribbon has started and the dessication is beginning. Right here I wish to announce that, if there are any in the Stadium who so desire, if they will so state on their yard tickets,—or leave a note to that effect on the desk after the hour, the Monitor will arrange to give them front seats for next year.

There is so much for me to touch on, and so little time in which to do it, that I can merely dust over the accumulations of four years and leave the complete renovation of our deeds and misdeeds to that most enlightening of statisticians, the Class Report. Surely this is no place for me to take up such questions as "Do you drink?" What! Never! Ah, Hardly Ever. "Do you eat at Memorial? Why not?" The Lampoon will accuse me of stealing that one, but there is no foundation for the accusation; I saw it first. Or a question like, "Are you Married? If so, to where and whom did it take place?" But, lest the Class Report should not chance to come under your gaze, I wish to speak for myself, John, and my ultimatum by and large is never, unless something turns up pretty soon. Still, I am "watchfully Waiting"; But with regard to this matter, there has been a serious devastation in the ranks of old Harvard this year. Well, you know its cause? Fair skin, faultlessly garbed, Mary Garden or Dactylissed—as the case may be, audience, (if you haven't got it yet, sniff about and you will). It is due to matrimony. Many of our most promising young men have been snapped up and have gone the primrose path of extravagance which leads to the infernal solitaire. And to-day, if you look carefully around, you will see many young ladies whose coiffure is irreproachable, trying to make you see that there is an invisible hairpin falling out, and, incidentally, blinding a few innocent bystanders with a flash from the Kimberly Diamond mines. But the College is bound to suffer and doubtless you wish to know how. If, since, Simmons has already shown the efficiency of a course for the preparation of steero cubes, corn flakes and Franko American Spaghetti, will it come to pass that Harvard will see fit to drop from the curriculum such courses as semitic and Indic-Philology 59, and substitute domestic science, 1A and 1B--1A to deal with ordinary business suits; and 1B, with dress suits divorce suits and summer flannels? If this be the case, I claim the right to ask, under what group in the elective system such a course will fall? Sweet Glycerite of tannin! But I beg your pardon, you don't know anything about the famous, or infamous group system for electing courses—Do you? No, I thought not; But don't feel badly. You have nothing on us and we have been playing hare and hounds with it for four years. Its basis is a gigantic card index; the cards in which are always stacked against one. Later in the term, I shall devote an entire lecture, possibly two, to a seathing denunciation of the system. But, with tears in my eyes—you are so far away that you cannot see them—I am forced to admit that fitting denunciation cannot be the work of one man. And, as I am merely an exchange professor in this course, I trust that the faculty will see fit to give a research course in this subject of the group system, which for obscurity and well-hidden mystery, is second only to the sphinx. And whereas Napoleon said of sphinx “Forty Centuries look down on you”, I might say, “Pari passu or per se,” and besides.

There is nothing new under the sun, so someone tells us, but look at Cambridge. The grinds can retire to the new library, the ragtime fiends can play till they drop in the new music building; anyone can be electrocuted proudly, with the highest voltage in captivity, at the new high tension laboratory; thanks to their new habitation, no longer will the freshmen have to resort to clearance sales to Keezer to get gold dust for the gold coast. It has ceased to be new, however, for Harvard to win at New York, New Haven, New London, New Jersey and Newton. And we are glad to state that there is now a different meaning in the words when we say that the return from the stadium is across a bridge of size. I mention New London, and let us again turn our attention there. It is with great pleasure that I announce that the management has secured me for this afternoon to deliver a brief lecture on the race with Yale. All ready now for the pictures. The first one will show . . . try that the other way around. Will the lady in the back row kindly remove her hat or leave the stadium? I can't have the shadow of a regret all over the screen; moreover, it disturbs the picture man. This isn't the slide I want. I want the one depicting the Yale rowing system. Isn't there such a slide up there? Well then, throw on a blank sheet, that will illustrate it. To begin with, the system was English, which was bad. The oarsmen were required to wear cutaways, and Pumps were retained as it was considered that they might be of use in case of rough water. The chart of the race is most interesting. With the course running this way, immediately Yale blundered. At the start, when the whistle blew for 5 o'clock, Harvard alone started up the river. Yale had to have her tea, by jove! and that ended the controversy. Although this was at the start, it was, paregorical as it may sound, her dying gasp. Hence, the cross marking the spot is peculiarly significant.

But friends, roomates, and company,
I come to bury Eli, not to praise her.
The evil that Yale does lives after her,
The good is oft interred in defeat.
So let it be with Eli. The noble Colgate (16-6)
Hath told you Eli was ambitious;
If so, it were a grievous fault,
And Grievously hath Eli answered it (15-5).
And this was the most unkindest cut of all.

And thus, after an unsuccessful season, we see the final curtain fall on Yale's grim little tragedy entitled "Come Back." (my dexterity with jestures shows a highly developed ambiguity, does it not?) But don't leave it with last years' race: there is another one coming. And this year Harvard is going to be presented with an arbitrary record of three minutes, while Yale is to be timed not with a stop watch, but with a Swiss movement non-refillable hour-glass. So when you are at your various spreads and tripping all over the light fantastic camp chairs at Beek, think of our Vikings at Red Top, and drink them a toast to victory in the vintage of our Secretary of State. Get the Welch habit, it's one that won't get you.

I don't know how you feel about it, but I am inclined to think that, although we are, so to speak, more or less, or vice versa, on common ground (sounds exactly as if I had forgotten it, doesn't it?) still we are nevertheless at the same time entirely of one mind: that, notwithstanding you laugh and the world laugh with you, Lampoon, and you laugh alone, if at all, and moreover, no one doubts for a minute that the militia is less essential in Mexico than in the South Entry of Thayer, and that the author of the well-known ballad "On the Old Fall River Line" missed the chance of a lifetime by publishing the song before Harvard College left for the Princeton game, which, however, is entirely up to you, as Horace says, "Hæc Onnes non Vobis said Nobis en lo que vous m' avez gesagt," and the truth, since we are searching for the truth, can do no less than proclaim from the housetops "At last we have a man," and that you should be certain that you see in me the right man and that, when the button is pressed and you start for the door, you can rely on me when I say, "Kendall Next."

We are Harvard men; we were students, and by our walks ye shall know us. Yea verily, and by our books. A man with a Wednesday Transcript is a genealogist; one with an Atlantic Monthly has a thesis on his hands; one with an Outlook is seeking progressive opinion; and one with a Cosmopolitan Magazine is bound for Riverside to drift under the gypsy moths and study human nature.

Today you see us on the crest of the wave, full of health and good spirits. But tomorrow, when the Yard is depopulated, when the last brass band has faded before the midnight swim in the fountains, and when the Japanese lanterns have committed Hari Kari, we will stagger out to breakfast at the café St. James, 61½ Holyoke Street. And if some one should stop us on the street and say "Well, La Tosca, how are you?" our minds will jump to the oft heard cue, and regretting the follies of yesterday—for tomorrow today will be yesterday—and with a perfect disregard for the deep truth in our reply, we will answer, "O! I can't explain."

We have struggled for four years, gone through the mazes of the elective system; we have been undone by probation, left bare by the Phillips Brooks House clothing collection, and sunburned on the senior picnic (as a matter of fact it was foggy on that day, but I needed the last part to fill in), and now what have we come to? A great privilege has fallen to our lot, it is our class day, think of it. But little do you realize how closely class day rhymes with, and becomes synonymous with, cash day. Even so, we have one thing to be proud of. Since senior classes began deserting the Gold Coast, ours is the first to leave the yard without a shady recollection. You sit there with everything in your favor; even the sun is behind you in this. I mean the solar orbit. The other son, the filial segment, well, that is behind you too, cowering. And after this day, it is likely to remain behind you till, taken as a whole, it settles its particular share of the profit of T. D. Cook & Sons, caterers. But our enthusiasm is so great that tomorrow you must be careful that you don't have to say "Alas, indigestion is in our midst." Here is our first glimpse of the high cost of living. Sandwiches have gone up. Now that they are ordered, if delivered on time, they will be going down. All we can say is, let them go, and God bless them. And now, ladies and gentlemen, I have but a word more to say. Doubtless you have heard that line about the word 'more' before, but don't regard it as a cue to settle back for a half hour against the shoes of the people behind you. I shall be brief. My one word is this: If you still wish to retain your popularity with me, don't let me hear you say on your way back to the Yard, "Ah me!" I spent a nice week here this afternoon." At the conclusion of the rest of the exercises,—you may go.

CLASS ODE

PITMAN BENJAMIN POTTER

To the shrine of the Fathers, its clear glowing beam,
In ending-time meekness we come;
Shower on us thy wisdom, thy spirit of truth,
Light our eyes, move our lips that are dumb.
Waiting here, silent, suppliant, thee we beseech,
To thy hearth-fire of love lowly bend;
Give us, Mater, thy guidance, thy handclasp of strength,
That we serve in thy name to the end.

Be the task what it may, be the path rough or long,
Be thou guide,—and we follow thee far;
With thy courage of right in the heart we can safe
Pace the road lit by nought but thy star.
In the end bring us back, oh Mater, once more,
Gather then all thy children to thee;
In the still, softening light of a quieting day,
Oh, compose us in harmony.

ORATION

“THE UNDERGRADUATE’S LACK OF RELIGION”

The reaction against formalism in contemporary religious thought has given currency to the phrase “the religious attitude toward life.” Religion is essentially that,—it is a way of viewing the world, of interpreting the facts of human life so that they shall bear significant relations to one another—so that the whole shall mean something.

There is involved a philosophy,—a framework upon which the substance is to be built; there are the forms of expression—the worships and ceremonials in the broadest sense, the festivals and the pageantry. There are the implications for human behavior—the moral code sanctioned by the religion. The core of the whole thing is, however, the attitude of mind, the world-view, the philosophic system.

And a religion must be socially constituted. By no other mode of procedure can a religion be effective. Individualism in religion is not for the many, much less for the all. A religion can take no smaller unit than the tribe, the race—all human kind. It is necessarily an inclusive institution.

Finally it must be expressed. Denied expression it dries at the roots. Expression being necessary to evolution, a religious mind must be afforded avenues of activity in worship, in ceremony, in deed—or it will be ineffectual for the individual and for the group.

Let us turn to the American undergraduate in the light of the facts. Of course the religious attitude of mind should be more prevalent here than in the community at large for two reasons. Our students are, presumably, young men, and—again “presumably”—they are comparatively naïve and unspoiled and not yet hardened, by contact with the world, into cynicism. They should have nought but a generous and benevolent interpretation of life to offer. Again, they come in touch, here, with the leaders in spiritual advance, and with the best that man has thought and felt for ages. They live in an atmosphere pregnant with all the higher spiritual values of human history. Surely we should find more of the distinctively religious motive here than in a worldly-wise and wisdom-barren adult community!

On what evidence may we rely? Primarily on conversation, allowing for bragadocio and reticence and such qualifying influences; the best index of the habit of mind is the habit of speech. Then we may turn to attendance at chapel services, allowing for qualifying factors here too; for, while a religious mind may be found outside the area of public worship it is not likely. Such a spirit needs expression in a religious service and that in group worship. Two previous observations, the need for expression and the social quality of religion—warrant this conclusion.

Only to a slight degree may we rely on Brooks House social service as evidence. For the distinctively religious impulse is not large there. The executive instinct, the taste for management—very strong at our period of life—call it the instinct for workmanship if you would, blends with imitation and purely social instincts to assist a weak religious motive. Many men do such work from perfectly unreligious reasons, few who work there are actuated even mainly by purely religious zeal.

Tested by these methods the undergraduate is found wanting. He deprecates any discussion of religious topics, whether purely theological or ethical or what not. They are consigned with all kinds of philosophy to the limbo of profitless discussions. The pitiful barrenness of these uninspired lives! The appalling dulness of these unreligious people! Hundreds of us go through Harvard—the Harvard, at least in outward semblance, of Emerson and Lowell and James and Shaler—on a dead level of respectability.

And we can, at times, in our more sentimental moods, conceive this as a religion! It may be so conceived with reference to our little group of illuminati. But it were a poor commentary on our spiritual capacities if that were our greatest achievement in religious development. As a religion of humanity it is fatuous. Our many students are, except for a liberal few, untouched by the great currents of human life. What a dreary waste is the spiritual life of our scoffing, worldly-wise youths!

And Appleton Chapel draws but a fighting handful to service. The service is often deeply religious, beautifully spontaneous, aesthetically perfect. At least the conditions are present for such a service. But the undergraduate, except for a scant three hundred, does not attend regularly—unless once a year can be called “regularly.” That is a fact; despite protective qualifications to the effect that only fifteen hundred live within “chapel limits”—one of those overwhelming arguments of glass,—that we are too busy now, and so on.

Similarly, Brooks House has to fight for attendance at purely religious services. Three Seniors out of this class appeared recently for a “class” meeting with a devoted teacher of known interpretative ability. Social service is done in plenty, and religious motives are unknown and unsought for.

Now there may be just causes for all this. The Puritanic traditions of Harvard, it may be, so constrict free expression that the undergraduate, burning with the fires of good-will and aspiration, holds back, is reticent even as the fathers were sparing of speech and action that revealed the heart. It may be, again, that our theological catholicity,—the fact that we have no accepted or given theological fold into which to gather our student zealots of varied creeds and gods—it may be that this result is too great a religious anarchy for the purposes of social religious unity.

I am inclined to believe it is two more culpable causes. We are hopelessly provincial. A fairly prosperous and happy community, sophisticatedly content, we forget what goes on outside our circle, and we assume, falsely, an attitude of complete wisdom that relieves us of the responsibility of finding out. We are pathetically satisfied with a comfortable and, within limits, happy lot. The bigger issues of life, the further reaches of human experience, the nether mill-stone—these are beyond our petty little world. Complacent, satisfied and inert, we move on our accustomed jaunts obvious to the size of the problems about us.

And we are over-trained. We are specialized out of our humanity. Our professors, become mechanics in their specialties, experts in their hopeless little mechanical workshops, are so busy turning out more pitifully erudite and dry-hearted, knowledge-monging Ph.D.'s, that they know nothing of what goes on in the next cell. How can they have any significant view of their work? We are so tied to our specialties that no comprehensive view of life is possible. Stifled in our little habits of thought we never breathe the large air of human progress.

Some of this we want to remedy. For, I take it, we are not content to do without religious aspiration yet. Certainly religion is still a valuable social institution. But we may not want a popular service in Appleton Chapel. We may prefer a quiet, individually acute religious atmosphere with the minimum of social worship. And, although this attitude must not be carried too far, it constitutes a salutary position. It is doubtful if the present situation, in so far as attendance at chapel service goes, is to be seriously deplored.

But the Puritanic reserve—in so far as it is not an excuse to hide spiritual shallowness—has a very lean balance in its favor. Lack of free expression means soul-stifling and heart-drying. The youth of this community simply must have free expression for their spiritual lives!

And too great a catholicity must not blind us to the great universals of all religions. Our catholicity must be positive as well as negative. Love of fellow man, desire for sincerity and strength of life—the great fundamentals of all human religion—surely we can agree upon these.

Finally we must fight against privative specialization. We must take our great humanists out of hampering administrative positions and put them in direct contact with the student. Let the mechanics of the University be left to the middle-aged executive whose genius lies in the direction of practical management; but let us give our young men with their visions—in so far as Ph.D. training has not prematurely aged them too—and our older men, with their mature sweetness and strength—let us give these men the right of way in the hearts of our students. Extirpate the soulless academic pedant! Gain by distribution of studies a comprehensiveness of view, a width of vision which shall give human understanding.

Mechanism treads hard on the heels of any big institution and has wellnigh involved our University, dedicated "Christo et Ecclesiae," in a spiritual famine. We must have humanists in chapel, too, at the expense, perhaps of some high church dignitary, capable of a pathetically clever diatribe on some complex theological squabble, but a lamentable failure as a source of inspiration. University preaching, so-called, is a science—or an art!—which belongs in the theological school. Appleton Chapel is the only source of inspiration which the undergraduate has and we need young men, young-hearted men, with the problems of youth on their lips. We need music and reading, and healthy, spontaneous service. Such is the battle, for youth and life, against death and specialization.

Harvard is not alone in this situation. I have laid heavy emphasis on the dark places for the purpose of arresting the attention to them. And I know there are many, many things to be said on the other side. But these are the facts, and the silent demand of the social crises of our day must be met.

The great fault, that which allows such a state of affairs to exist at all, is the inertia of a big institution. It has long been called, with reference to our particular situation, and with a loose phraseology, Harvard Indifference.

But it can be shaken off. On the spiritual foundations laid by Lowell and Emerson and the host of our leaders of the past let us build up, vitalize, and render significant, in terms of social sympathy and religious service to the community, the external spirit of Harvard. Out of the past of her glorious service to the nation may the University arise to meet the renewed demands of the day, alive, capable, inspired, the Harvard which knows no spiritual death, which lives in the future, not in the past, and which is a living spiritual force, today!

DISQUISITION

HARVARD'S RELIGION

WALLACE OSGOOD FENN.

Is there any one religion which is common to Harvard men? Perhaps even a liberal minded Harvard audience would be disposed to deny it. Yet there is, undoubtedly, a thoroughly characteristic Harvard attitude toward life, which is of such a nature that it may very properly be called a religion, in a broad sense of the term. And furthermore, this Harvard attitude toward life is so vital, genuine, and all-pervading, that as an actual guiding principle in Harvard lives, I believe it is of more real service than any one conventional religion.

Any attempt to define the Harvard attitude toward life must be defective, but some of its characteristics may be mentioned. It is essentially broad-minded, comprehensive, and tolerant. It demands faithful performance of duty and discountenances evil, and selfish or sordid ambitions. While respecting manly sport and scholarly achievement, it insists that they be not cheap and boisterous, but simple, dignified, unassuming and undemonstrative. These are the high ideals it inculcates, but it also teaches loyalty to these ideals. Harvard's motto is "Veritas" which means truth, truth to one's self and to one's ideals.

Such is a suggestion of the typical Harvard attitude toward life. Is it not also a religion? To be sure it has no more to do with the chapel than with the class room, no more to do with theology than with botany, no more to do with Phillips Brooks House than with the editorial desk or the gridiron, no more to do with the idea of God than with the compressibility of atoms or the problems of photosynthesis. Yet is it not still a religion? For what is religion in its essence but an attitude toward life, a guiding principle for life, a set of high ideals conscientiously followed? Every man has ideals of some sort in accordance with which he regulates his life, which form for him his personality and which determine for him his habitual attitude toward life. If they also lead him in the paths of righteousness, they are his religion, practically speaking, no matter in what religious forms he may profess to believe. Surely the Harvard attitude toward life leads to righteousness and may therefore fairly be called Harvard's religion.

The Harvard religion is the resultant of many individual religions or personalities, past and present, great and small. Such for example are the brave dead whom Memorial Hall commemorates? We cannot help feeling, sometimes at least, that the ideals for which they died pervade this place, and consciously or unconsciously we take away with us some of their attitude toward life. So also, the walls of our college rooms radiate the personalities of former occupants, of Phillips Brooks, Emerson, Holmes, and Wendell Phillips. The very atmosphere of the Yard becomes positively alive with Harvard religion when we think of the hundreds of souls who have toiled, failed, and triumphed, within its precincts.

The college preachers and professors also contribute to the spiritual atmosphere of the University. In this capacity, other things being equal, the professor is the more important of the two for his opportunities for close personal intercourse with the students are more numerous and even the exposition of the principles of physics does not preclude the expression of religion. Certainly the lectures of Professor Shaler in natural history and Professor Norton in fine arts, of a college generation ago, showed no lack of religion, for every sentence they uttered fairly glowed with the warmth of their personalities and the nobility of their Harvard ideals, which as we have seen are the essentials of religion. Without such unconscious expression of the spirit, a lecture is but a mass of unassimilated intellectuality, bare facts and principles, disjointed and void of significance for life. Even though the seeds of learning fall not amid the thorns of the dull student's mind but upon the good ground of the scholar's mind. they will not germinate unless they are alive with the personality of the sower.

Harvard has many such sowers of learning today, men to whom hundreds of Harvard graduates owe a large share of their spiritual being. Yet she needs more of them, especially in the large introductory courses where nothing is more out of place than a narrow minded research professor who is capable of nothing more than a dry presentation of insignificant elementary facts. Few beginners will continue in their subject and they do not want a broad scientific foundation to fit them for advanced work. They want merely to enlarge their view of life by studying the religion of a new teacher in the language of a new science. What matter then if the introductory professor say the Angiosperms came before the Gymnosperms, or the Gymnosperms before the Angiosperms, if he but fulfil this higher function. What matter if the student of Physiology cannot name every bone in the body, if he has learned the spirit of the science. If he be contemplating advanced work, he will learn the facts for himself. If he be an elementary student he will soon forget them. That which remains and is of real value is the personal religion of the professor, expressed, unconsciously, through the language of his science.

The Harvard religion then is one of personality. It is the personality, the spirit, the atmosphere of the University. Every characteristic of Harvard, therefore, is faithfully reflected in her religion. So the Harvard religion is liberal, like Harvard; it is many-sided, like Harvard; but above all it is life-like, like Harvard. There are few rules here which limit the expression of our individuality. Our time is largely our own; our choice of studies is largely our own. There are no artificial standards here. Harvard is not a Utopia of American life. Rather does it accurately mirror that life. If there is snobbery here, a lack of democracy, a certain social exclusiveness, so is there in the American life which we are fitting ourselves to enter. There is drunkenness at Harvard as there is in America; there is laziness, indifference to duty, immorality, gambling, and partiality to the athlete. In short Harvard is a miniature America with all its evil and all its good. We are therefore enabled to face the evil of the world early in our lives and under the best of influences. It is to this that the Harvard religion owes its value as a life religion. In this respect it is not peculiar; the whole tendency of the age is toward just such a religion. Harvard, however, with her great teachers, her liberality, and her natural atmosphere is well in the lead.

So much then for the characteristics of Harvard's religion, its origin and continued existence through the influence of personalities, and its peculiar fitness for life. It only remains to ascertain how far this religion is the actual guiding principle of Harvard lives; whether it really is the Harvard religion or some other, perhaps a conventional religion, which leads us through the routine of daily life, through temptation and adversity.

It is certain that no man can spend four years here without catching some of the spiritual atmosphere of this University and if he catches it he must find some place for it in his habitual attitude toward life. It may occupy a subordinate place; the effect may be quite subconscious; but it must be there.

We can go still farther. There are many men, practical rather than spiritual in their tendencies, who have never attempted to define a religion for themselves. They do not deny the idea of God as a ruling force in their lives. Nevertheless they find no place for it in their daily thoughts. And when a temptation arises it is not the idea of God, which with a firm hand guides their steps aright, but rather a faith in the ideals of manhood and duty inculcated at Harvard. If we are pragmatists, therefore, we shall agree that for these the Harvard religion is the more vital of the two because it "works" where the conventional religion proves ineffectual.

We can go still farther. There are many men, they are a well known type, who are spiritual in their tendencies, who have with great care and thought worked out a religion for themselves and who still find no support in the idea of God.

Yet they, too, have a more vital religion than most conventional believers. It is solely a creation of their own, built up by imitation of personalities, by studying life through many eyes, by studying religion in Harvard's many languages, the language of the class room as well as the chapel, the language of science as well as metaphysics, the language of evil as well as good. In short in studying many-sided liberal-minded Harvard they have studied life and developed a life religion.

And so it is with all Harvard men whether we know it or not. We all form our ideals of life in an atmosphere of Harvard personalities. These ideals either constitute our whole religion or are at least the foundations upon which a more conventional superstructure may be built. This common basis is what we mean by Harvard's religion and it is this which unifies all Harvard men even as Christ by his personality, still unifies all Christian denominations.
